Admin-biog history

In 1843 the Royal College of Surgeons of England decreed that only Fellows [a very limited number of members of the College] could have a role in the governance of that College, effectively cutting out the majority of those practising general medicine from having a say in the profession. A group of disaffected members set up an Association [National Association of General Practitioners of Medicine, Surgery and Midwifery] which set about lobbying for an institution or College to represent them. It quickly gained 4000 members but the attempt came to nothing a year later.
